Communities of refugees living in Europe experience health inequalities and psychosocial stress. In European Union countries, refugees living in reception centres are offered psychological support by mobile mental health teams. This study investigates whether the provision of mental health care by mobile teams improves mental health indicators in a refugee camp. The study compares mental health symptoms before and after the beginning of the intervention in a refugee camp in Greece. A quasi-experimental design was used. The control group consisted of 546 refugees, while the intervention group comprised 423 refugees. Self-reports were administered using the General Health Questionnaire (GHQ-28) to assess symptoms of depression, anxiety
